The Future.

(Lines suggested while contemplating a superb piece of art, being an aquatint statue of a distinguished Major (reared in the American army.)

By TOO-QUA-STER.

Ah! Sing of the Future as much as much as you please!

The pleasures of hope, and achieve ments to win!

The notes of your songlet may wane on the breeze,

When time shall record what your future has been.

Oh give me the Past with its victories all won!

Whose harvest of praise to the sickle responds,

With garlands of honor blid up by the ton.

Of glories immortal in marble and bronze,

To sit on your war-horse of muscular steel.

His nostrils distended, and yet without breath;

While, stung into wrath by the spur on your heel,

He vainly endeavors to plunge to the death!

To sit on your charger regardless of weather,

Through all the long days of the slow-ruling year,

Nor have to consult a grim destiny whether

There's sight in the bolts of the morrow to fear!

In winter, though stormied by the snow and the sleet,

No word of complaint from your lips is heard spoken;

Even scorched by the summer's intolerable heat,

Your mastery main of content is unbroken.

Above the dominion of ill is your lot,

There's nothing in darkness to waken your dread,

Nor yet in the light to reveal any spot

To mar the good name of an honorable dead.

Be proud of your glory! A trime let it be

On Earth's adulatory tongue evermore;

All hosts that tread by you like a stream in the sea,

All glance up their praises like those on before.

O state ever blest! O give me the Past!

Its garnered achievements, like fruit of the ground,

Which deal a sweet odor when harvest is past,

Shed always the light of true glory around.
